Political Development

Monday 2:10-4 pm

Course Description: This is a graduate course in political development. It will focus on the development of, and relationship among, the three constituent features of the modern political world: states, nations and democracy.

The course will analyze both historical and contemporary cases, tracing how causal processes unfold over time and space and what past conditions and experiences lie behind today's political dynamics and problems. Along the way, the course will introduce students to the main approaches and schools of thought in the political development literature.

The course will encourage rigorous comparative thinking and writing and prepare students for general exams and dissertation work.

Requirements: Readings are extensive and must be done before each class. Each student will be required to write seven short papers (of 2-4 pages each) over the course of the term. These papers should engage the debates presented in the readings for the week. They should be thought pieces and will be used to help structure class discussions. They must be emailed to me by 12pm of the Saturday before class. (Examples of what these papers should look like will be posted on the courseworks website.) The final project for the class will be a mock general exam in comparative politics. The short papers will count for 50% of the grade, class participation 20%, and the final project, 30%.

This course requires a lot of writing. If you do not feel comfortable writing a lot of papers, this is probably not the course for you.

Course Readings: Almost all readings are available via courseworks. Some will also be put on reserve at Lehman library.
